
The undeniable truth: Reject the insanity.
DO NOT CONSENT

The MK-ULTRA thing

is now an undeniable fact.

Not that long ago, suggesting the CIA had a mind-control program would get you instantly labeled a "conspiracy-peddling nutjob." But today, the shady nature of that government project is 100% established truth. We absolutely know the CIA did horrific, unethical experiments on people to figure out mind control. Seriously, if you haven't, go look at the declassified files, including the stuff connected to the late Jeffrey Epstein. Ignoring this documented history is, frankly, why bad actors keep getting away with stuff.

MK-ULTRA was real. The part we know about was terrifying. What's left to the imagination is the extent of the horror in all the documents and evidence they destroyed.

This isn't about what you believe; it's about documented facts. You

The Shift from Abstract Theory to Lived Experience

CHAPTER ONE

I can no longer simply dismiss this as an abstract narrative because these very 'conspiracies' are being dragged into the harsh light of reality. It is one thing to passively watch a YouTube video on the topic; it is an entirely different matter when I find myself on the receiving end of a phone call. As a crisis counselor with over a decade in behavioral health — someone who has taken thousands of these calls — I am no longer just an observer. I am listening to a voice that could very well belong to someone highly likely experiencing phenomena that has been systematically dismissed as mere psychosis.

Let's talk about the person diagnosed with schizophrenia. What they experience is totally and completely real. It's not in their head, and they aren't pretending; it's a genuine, subjectively real output created inside their mind.

Scientific studies show that when a person with schizophrenia hears voices, the parts of their brain that handle sound and language react exactly the same way an 'average' brain does when having a conversation with another person. The brain lights up identically.

The key difference is this, and here's an analogy:

- Average Brain vs. Neurological Disorder (e.g., Epilepsy, Traumatic Brain Injury):

These are different types of hardware.

- Fuck Average Brain vs. Psychological Disorder (e.g., Schizophrenia, Bipolar Disorder):

This is the same kind of hardware, but it's running different software—software tuned into different frequencies and writing different wavelengths. The physical brain structure is the same.

The Tyranny of Perception and the Ultimate Gaslight

CHAPTER TWO

The big philosophical question is: If the only way we access reality is through what we perceive as real, how can we possibly decide what is real for someone else?

If I feel agonizing pain from being pinched, the fact that you don't feel it doesn't suddenly make my pain fake. It wasn't real to you, but it was 100% real to me, and it hurt. Therefore, it is absolutely real.

To claim that a sight, a sound, or a feeling processed by another person—something we, the outsider, can't sense—is not real is the biggest gaslight of the century.

The Cultural Context of Voices

CHAPTER THREE

Think about the cultural side of these experiences. In non-Western countries, people who show what we call 'schizophrenia symptoms' are often looked up to as spiritual leaders, shamans, or seers. In those places, the 'voices' are often encouraging, predicting the future, or offering guidance. In the Western world, the culture is hostile, and guess what? The voices are hostile, too.

Maybe these individuals are:

- Seeing or hearing entities in a different realm (demons, angels, aliens, DMT entities, whatever you want to call it).
- Tuned into a greater capacity of their brain than the average person (more than the famous 10%).
- The subjects of a secret government program.
- Given the established, undeniable facts we have about government experimentation, who can honestly say I'm wrong?

How can we possibly accept the overly simple story that schizophrenics are just "crazy"? Arguably, the truly demented people were the scientists and doctors of the 1940s and 50s who performed awful surgeries and unethical experiments. We learned our basic understanding of the human brain using test subjects who were hospitalized, stripped of their rights and freedom, lying on a surgical bed with their skulls wide open and awake, while a doctor messed with their gray matter. Yes, it helped us learn, but at what an immense cost?

Lobotomies in Pill Form

CHAPTER FOUR

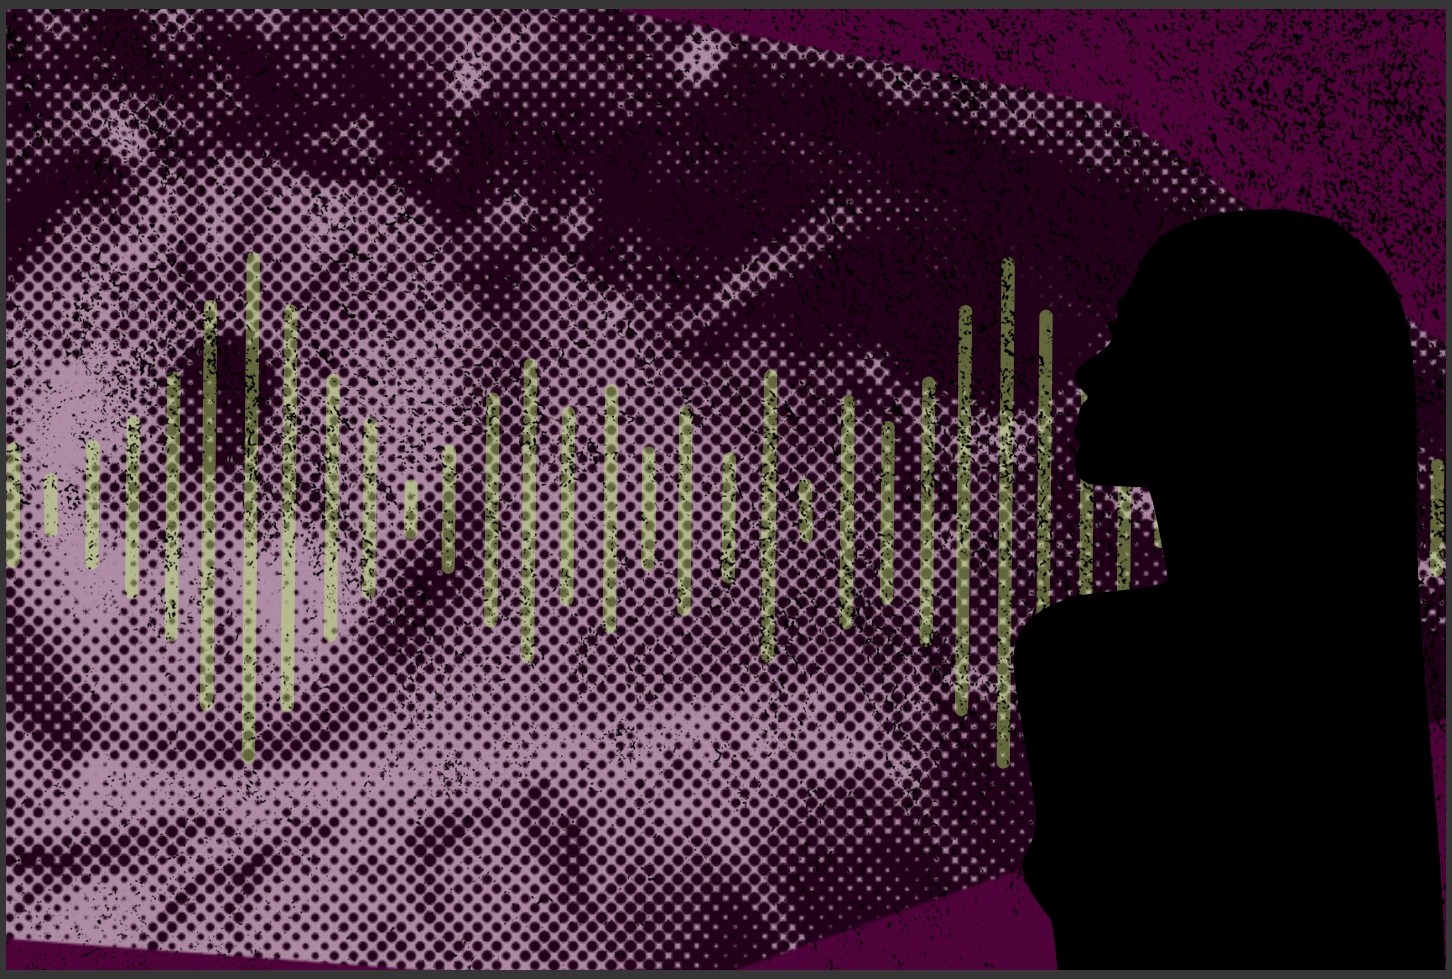

The brutal practice of lobotomies didn't really disappear; it just turned into a chemical one. The goal of a "successful" lobotomy was a tamed, passive, zombie-like state. A lot of people on SSRIs and antipsychotics, if the drug is "working," report that very same zombie-like state. That's exactly why most people eventually stop taking their meds, often against their doctor's advice.

I'm not telling anyone to stop their medication; always talk to your doctor. What I am stating, in my informed opinion, is this: Your brain isn't "messed up" until you put those pills in it. The medication scrambles your brain.

Big Pharma doesn't want to cure you; it barely wants to treat you. It wants you to be a repeat customer.

Try to make this scenario make sense: Someone attempts suicide by taking a bottle of pills and gets hospitalized. After a couple of weeks of aggressive, forced medication, they are sent home with a month's supply of pills that might have the explicit side effect of causing suicidal thoughts. If that's not the most painfully obvious, blatant sign that the system is designed to keep you sick, I don't know what is.

Unignorable Calls: Evidence from the Field

It's one thing to believe these conspiracies; it's another thing entirely to be living them, to be called "crazy," and to face forced hospitalization. I hope I never become one of those individuals, but I'm no longer just watching from the sidelines.

The HAM Frequencies

Caller 1

The first person I spoke with, diagnosed with schizophrenia since the 1990s, sounded perfectly normal, lived on their own, and worked their whole life. Their only 'quirk' was the voices. I asked some curious questions, and they randomly used the word "HAM."

"What is HAM?" I asked.

"They are Him," the caller replied.

"Who told you that?"

"Well, they did. I would hear them talking amongst each other, calling themselves that."

They confirmed they had never heard the term "HAM" before the voices, hadn't been told it, and hadn't looked it up. Given their age and the fact that their experiences started in the 90s, being labeled crazy for so long naturally discourages investigation.

Look up what HAM stands for: High Amplitude Modulation, or in this context, HARRP And Mk-Ultra. The very idea of frequencies being broadcast into people's minds. I 100% believe my caller.

Spiritual Warfare

Caller 2

A second caller experiencing super intense, scary audio hallucinations mentioned briefly that the whole thing felt like a spiritual warfare. They confirmed they were using all the standard resources—psychiatrist, psychologist, medication—but the answer to "Is it helping?" was "No."

I shared that I had similar experiences and got over them through faith. I told those entities, "In the name of Jesus Christ, you are not welcome here," and they left immediately. Whether that result is the placebo effect or a real metaphysical reality, what matters is that it worked.

My caller did the same thing while still on the phone with me. Declaring, "In the name of Jesus Christ, you are not welcome here, you need to leave!" They instantly felt better. The voices stopped right away. Again, placebo or not—it worked, and that's the main thing, since the standard medical approach wasn't.

The Grooming Pipeline

Caller 3

The third call is the toughest to talk about, but here's what I can share: There are "gifted programs" designed to take the top two percent of Black and Latino students from underserved, inner-city schools and put them into elite schools, basically setting them up for "success." On the surface, this looks like a wonderful chance, an opportunity they'd never get in the "ghetto."

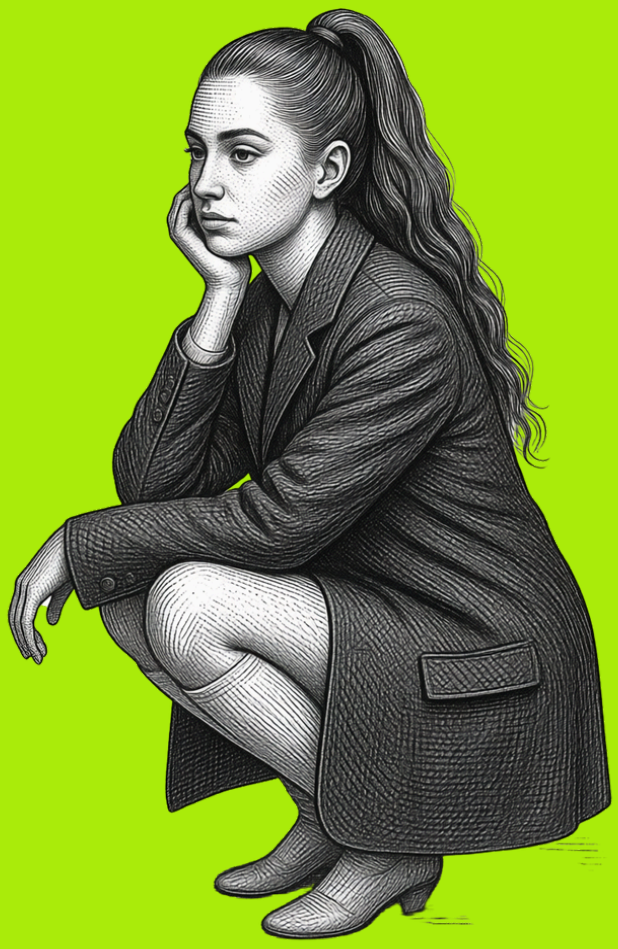

But when you dig a little deeper, as I did, and look at the donors and the organization's namesake, you have to ask: Could they be any more obvious with the 1984 theme?

These opportunities for success are great, but they come with a huge price tag. The reason they pull out the top minority students isn't because they care about their future; it's because they care about their agenda.

They don't want another Malcolm X. They don't want another Martin Luther King Jr. They don't want minorities to become activists, to fight for the improvement of their entire community, and to push for group success. They want to prevent that unity. So, they take these kids—the top two percent, the ones with the most profound potential—and they groom them for their own agenda.

That's all I can say about that call, but I believe that caller. I believe all three of my callers.

My Non-Compliance

I went off-script. I said what I believed. I backed them up. And I don't care if I get into trouble for doing it. I will not cave to this ridiculous narrative. I will not comply with this fake world they want us to live in. I don't consent to it, and neither should you.

The people who comply—the people who blindly believe the mainstream story, the propaganda, the government-fed garbage that is the media—those people are the exact reason why the elite get away with what they do.
